What does „my Internet of the future" look like?

It doesn't exist. The end.

Alright, I can explain myself: the question itself contains a wrong assumption. Why am I supposed to be saying something about MY Internet of the future if the Internet is not mine?

I mean, this is the biggest "Internet problem" these days. Many people consider it to be theirs – a place where they can do whatever they want. And that's why we have to deal with such a big "haters problem". It's quite normal to get mad when somebody puts your most-hated dish in the middle of your room and that's exactly how haters perceive online content – since Internet is THEIRS and somebody just posted a video they don't like, they have a right to criticize it in the worst way possible, right?

If I truly were to describe MY Internet of the future, then I guess we would have to deal with websites focused mostly on mathematics and literature plus some anime. But rest assured – Internet is not mine, nor is it anyone else's. And that's a relief indeed!

But even putting this blunder in a subject aside, this is exactly what my vision of the Internet of the future looks like. The Internet – a place where anybody can just be themselves and create content others might like. Not everybody, of course, but that's how it should stay. Although my vision seems to be quite problematic. Why? Because it's not a vision of the future, this is the present! Guess I have failed.

Or have I? I can listen to any kind of music I like. I can read blogs on various subjects. I can find information I need. I can find shops with whatever I desire. And I do it all knowing that every other person using the Internet can find stuff they like – even though it may be completely different from what I am looking for. True, Internet is not perfect, but should we seek perfection? As long as Internet is not mine, the apocalypse is not coming anyway…
